Hey, I think I have seen a friend with similar "spots" or pigmentations - you are talking about the slight tan pigmentations on the "head" of the penis, correct? ... I think you may be on to something if you think the girl had a fungus. My friend is in denial but I think he may have candida overgrowth and that would make sense, because he isnt circumcized and I swear I have seen the same pigmentation - even darker freckle or distinct mole type spots on his. From what I have learned, skin issues are often a body 'filtering' issue, meaning liver-related. The liver is the body's filter, so maybe if you do a liver flush, you will benefit from it. You know how people get liver spots? Same idea. Just an idea, but from everything I've been learning on here, that would be a great start. Get on the liver flush forum on this site for some good flushes. I havent done one yet, but I am going to in the next month. It is no longer possible to get tested for XMRV, as it has been shown that all the positive results were due to lab contamination, or cross re-activity in relation to serology tests. I previously tested positive myself. Numerous researchers from around the world have now proven beyond doubt that XMRV is not associated with ME/CFS and it is in fact highly unlikely that anybody is infected with this retrovirus, that was created in a lab during the 1990s. The fact that XMRV isn't a real human pathogen does not of course mean that your symptoms are all in your mind. ME/CFS is a recognised real neurological disease, if that's what you've been diagnosed with. The latest thinking and research indicates that it may be an autoimmune disease that can be triggered by several different viruses. This is also likely the case with multiple sclerosis. Sometimes it's all in the mind but it is much important to be safe that never. STD symptoms are rarely noticed until they are so obvious that you cannot notice them. Waiting until you show any STD symptoms can do more harm to your health than getting tested regularly for STDs. With the way the economy is today, your health is the one area of your life that you need to invest into. I don't think drinking your own urine will help cure herpes. Some of the most common symptoms of herpes include having small, painful and red bumps on the skin, which start small. Eventually, these red bumps will be blisters that contain fluid inside. The blisters will break, which cause the skin to open and then these open sores will scab and heal. If you are sexually active, even if it is with the same partner, it is recommended that you get tested for the 6 most common sexually transmitted diseases and infections.
